It is not only that some members of the security forces have turned against the state in the course of the conflict and that some others have gone into hiding to escape punishment, but that some have been able to enjoy impunity. This impunity, of course, must be understood in the context of a weak civil society and in the situation of a state in which the constitutional court is considered a political actor and not a judicial body. In short, the impunity is due to the situation in which Burundi is currently placed, including the absence of state institutions, as well as the absence of a society capable of protecting its citizens. One of the main problem is the rise of the youth. This youth, rather than building a progressive movement to challenge the government, has developed a culture of violence and political repression, in which very often the security forces intervene. One would think that the rise of this youth, who have no purpose in life, who do not know where to go to learn, would foster a mass revolt. As opposed to this, they are trained to fight for the individual and not for the collective. This situation gives them no other option but to seek death, which they do in the streets and neighborhoods, killing each other.Last updated on.From the section Football Troy Deeney's hat-trick in West Brom's 4-0 win over Sunderland was his 50th league goal for the Baggies Troy Deeney's hat-trick in the Premier League on Friday was his 50th goal for West Bromwich Albion.
